UILE-ICE, s. m. Mistletoe; a nostrum; a panacea.—Macd. Arm. oil-yiach. W. ol-hiach. Ir. uile-iceach.

This is an ancient Druidical term, as we may learn from Pliny, who says of the mistletoe, that the Druids "called it by a word that signifies in their language all heal:" Omnia sanantem appellantes suo vocabulo.—Lib. xvi. ch. 44. The Druids gathered the mistletoe on the tenth of March. Toland supposes that Virgil (Æn. lib. vi.) alludes to the ceremony of consecrating the mistletoe, where he makes mention of the golden branch. Pliny, in the 16th book of his Nat. Hist., is particular in his description of the mistletoe. The following is a translation of it:—"The Druids (so they call their magi) hold nothing in such sacred respect as the mistletoe, and the tree on which it grows, provided it be an oak. They select certain woods of oak, and they do not perform any sacred rite without the leaf of that tree; so that hence it is likely they have been called Druids, explaining the name from the Greek, Δρυς, Drus, oak; Δρυΐδης, Oukides." Whatever grows on that tree, more than its natural growth, they think has been sent from heaven, and is a proof that the tree has been chosen by God himself. However that [species of mistletoe] is very rarely found, and when found it is sought after with great devotion; and especially at the sixth moon, which is the beginning of their months and years, and when the tree has passed its thirtieth year, because it has already abundant vigour, though not half-grown. They call it by a word signifying in their own language, ALL-HEAL; and having prepared sacrifices and feasts under the tree, they bring up two white bulls, whose horns are then first bound; the priest in a white robe ascends the tree, and cuts it off with a golden knife: it is received in a white sheet. Then, and not till then, they sacrifice the victims, praying that God would render his gift prosperous to those on whom he had bestowed it. When mistletoe is given as a potion, they are of opinion that it can remove animal barrenness, and that it is a remedy against all poisons.

† URSUL, uil, s. m. (Ir. id.) A pair of tongs.

CRUISG, s. m. (perhaps urt-uisge.) A brownie, or a being who was supposed to haunt lonely dells, moorland lakes, and waterfalls. He seems to have had the qualities of man and spirit curiously commingled.

Some have compared this class of imaginary beings to the satyrs of the ancients; but without reason, since they had no disposition, nor any point of character in common, excepting a fondness for solitude, which the brúigs possessed only at certain seasons of the year. About the end of harvest he became more sociable, and hovered about farm-yards, stables, and cattle-houses. He had a particular fondness for the products of the dairy, and was a fearful intruder on milkmaids, who made regular libations of milk or cream to charm him off, or to procure his favour. He could be seen only by those who had the second-sight; yet I have heard of instances where he made himself visible to persons who were not so gifted. He is said to have been a jolly personable being, with a broad blue bonnet, flowing yellow hair, and a long walking-staff. Every manor-house had its brúig; and in the kitchen, close by the fire, was a seat which was left unoccupied for him. The house of a proprietor on the banks of the Tay is, even at this day, believed to have been haunted by this sprite, and a particular apartment therein has been for centuries called seannar Bhriúaidh, Brownie's room. When irritated through neglect or disrespectful treatment, he would not hesitate to become wantonly mischievous. He was, notwithstanding, rather gainly and good-natured than formidable. Though, on the whole, a lazy, lounging hobgoblin, he would often bestir himself in behalf of those who understood his humours, and suited themselves thereto. When in this mood, he was known to perform many arduous exploits in kitchen, barn, and stable, (ne cernitur ulli), with marvellous precision and rapidity. These kind turns were done without bribe, fee, or reward; for the offer of any one of these would banish him for ever. Kind treatment was all that he wished for; and it never failed to procure his favour.

In the northern parts of Scotland the brúig's disposition was more mercenary. Brand, in his description of Zeland, observes, that "not above forty or fifty years ago almost every family had a brúenie, or evil spirit so called, which served them, to which they gave a sacrifice for his service; as when they churned their milk, they took a part thereof, and sprinkled every corner of the house with it for Brownie's use: likewise, when they brewed, they had a stone which they called Brúenie's stane, wherein there was a little hole, into which they poured some wort for a sacrifice to Brownie. They also had stacks of corn which they called Brownie's stacks, which though they were not bound with straw ropes, or any way fenced as other stacks used to be, yet the greatest storm of wind was not able to blow away straw off them."

The brownies seldom conversed with man, but they held frequent and affectionate converse with one another. They had their general assemblies too; and on these occasions they commonly selected for their rendezvous the rocky recesses of some remote torrent, whence their loud voices, mingling with the water's roar, carried to the ears of wondering superstition detached parts of their unearthly colloquies. In a certain district of the Highlands, FEALLAIDH an sguil, SLOCID-AILL a chiurt, and BRUNNAIDH 'n' casain, were names of note at those congresses; and they still live in legends which continue to amuse old age and infancy.

ALENECNA, an ancient name for Connaught in Ireland.

ALTHAN, the son of Conachar, was the chief bard or laureate of Arth, or Art, king of Ireland. On the death of Arth, he attended his son and successor as chief bard.

ALTHOS, one of the sons of Usnoth, chief of Etha, by Slissama, the sister of Cuchullin.

AMUN, an Irish chieftain, was the father of Fearl, who was slain in single combat by Cuchullin.

AOIBHIR-ALUINN, the daughter of Branno, king of Legu in Ireland, and wife of Ossian. Her beauty is celebrated in the fourth book of Fingal, and in other poems of Ossian.

AOIBHIR-CHAOIMHA, (Eivircoma), the wife of Gaul, and daughter of Casduconglas, Tem. B. III. Written also Emhir-chaoim.

ARDAR, the son of Usnoth, chief of Etha, and Slissama, the sister of Cuchullin. He was slain in battle at an early age, by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.—Fing. book i.

ARTHO, king of Ireland, was the father of that Cormac who was deposed and murdered by Cairbre the son of Borbarduthul.

ATHA. The name of Cairbre's palace in Connaught.

B.

BAILE CLUTHA, signifies the town of the Clyde, and is supposed to be the Alcluth of Bede.

BELTANXO, the wife of Cairbre the son of Cormac.

BOLG. The southern parts of Ireland were so called from the Bolg, or British Belgæ, who settled a colony there.

BORBAR, (borb-fhear), the father of Cathmor the generous, and of Cairbre the usurper. He was brother of that Colcuillamh, (Colgulla) who rebelled against Cormac, king of Ireland.

BORBARDUTHUL, a name given to the father of Cathmor. See BORBAR.

BOSGEAL, (fair-hand), was daughter of Colgar, a Connaught chief. She was wife of Cairbre, the son of Cormac, king of Ireland, who was dethroned by Cairbre, the son of Borbarduthul.

BOSMIN, (smooth-hand), the only daughter of Fingal, by Clatha, the daughter of Cathula, king of Innistore.

BRAIGH-GHEAL, (fair-neck), the wife of Cuchullin.

BRAIGH-SOLUIS, the sister of Cairbre, who slew Cridhmor in single combat. Braigh-soluis was secretly in love with Cridhmor: the fatal issue of this contest broke her heart, and hastened her death.

BRAN, the name of Fingal's favourite dog. Bran is a common name given to hounds and shepherd's dogs among the Gaidheal of Scotland.

BRAN, BRANO. A river in Caledonia, probably a brawling stream of that name, which tumbles into the Tay, near Dunkeld, a village in the county of Perth.

BRUMO. A place of worship in Craea, one of the Shetland isles.

C.

CAIRBRE, lord of Atha, in Connaught, and chief of the Firbolg. He was the son of Borbar, or Borbar-duthul. After the violent death of Cormac, king of Ireland, he usurped the government. He was a man of great bravery, but of an insidious and sanguinary disposition; and would make any sacrifice for power. He bore a lurking hatred to Oscar the son of Ossian. At Gabhra, in Ulster, these rival heroes engaged in single combat, and fell by mutual wounds.—Tem.

CAIRERE, the son of Cormac, king of Ireland. He assumed the government after his father, and reigned but a short while. He was succeeded by his son Artho, the father of that Cormac who was dethroned and murdered by Cairbre the son of Borbarduthul.

CAITHBAID, the son of Armui. He was the rival of Dubh-chomar, by whom he was slain.—Fing. book i.

CAITHBAID, or CATHBAIT, was the grandfather of the renowned Cuchullin.

CALTHONN, the son of that Rathmor who was murdered by Duntharmo, a prince residing on the Tweed. Calthonn and his brother Colmar were kept in confinement by Duntharmo, but were liberated by Caolmhal, his daughter.

CAOILTE, a Scandinavian chief, who was slain by Cairbre.

CAOL-ABHAINN, (a narrow river), was the name of the residence of Carrul, and was situated to the south of Agricola's Wall.

CAOLMHAL, (a woman with small eyebrows), was the daughter of Duntharmo, a cruel and ambitious prince, residing on the Tweed. She rescued from her father's captivity Calthonn and Colmar, the sons of the chief whom he murdered, and afterwards became the wife of the former.

CAOMH-MIAL, the daughter of Sarno, king of the Orkneys.

CARRAIG-THURA, (carraig nan tùr), the seat of Cathulla, king of Innistore.

CARRUIL, one of the bravest of the sons of Fingal. He was slain in single combat by Gaul, in a dispute of precedence. The bards poured their lamentation over him in the beautiful poem called Bàs Charruil. Another person of the same name was the son of Ceanfeadhna, Cuchullin's bard.

CARTHONN, the son of Clessamor and Maona. He was slain by his own father in single combat, in which each had engaged, without knowing his opponent.

CARUNN, i. e. (Car-amhainn), a stream in Scotland, now called Carron: it falls into the Forth near Falkirk.

CATHAID, or CATHAIT, was grandfather of Cuchullin; another of the same name, was the son of Armin, and the rival of Dubh-chomar, by whom he was slain.

CATHLINN, or GATH-LINN. The name given to a certain star by the Fingalian mariners. Some apply that name to the north polar-star.

CATHMOR, the son of Borbarduthul. Unlike his barbarous brother Cairbre, the usurper, his bravery was of the noblest description. He was not more brave than hospitable and generous. His modesty was such, that he could not bear to hear mention made of his own achievements. He was much attached to his brother, but affection towards such an object was like a crime than a virtue.

CATHUL, CATHUL, the son of Maronnan, or Moran, was the friend and companion of Oscar, the son of Ossian. He was murdered by Cairbre, the Irish usurper, in consequence of his attachment to the family of the dethroned Cormac.

CATHULLA, was king of Innistore, and father of Clatho, the second wife of Fingal.

CEANN-NAN-DAOINE, (the head of the people), the son of Duthmarino, or Dubh-mhic-Roinne.

CLAOIN-MHAL, an aged bard or druid.

CLAOIN-RATH, a district on the shore of Ligo, in Ireland.

CLATHO, the daughter of Cathulla, king of Innistore. She was the second wife of Fingal, to whom she bore Reyno, Fillean, and Bosmin.

CLONAR, the son of Conglas, of Imdr, one of the Hebrides.

CLONO, the son of Sithmhul, of Lora. He became the victim of a jealous Irish chief.

CLUAN-FHEAR, (man of the field), was killed in battle by Cormac Mac Cona, king of Ireland, the father of Roscrana, the first wife of Fingal.

CLUATH, CLUTHA. The river Clyde.

CLUN-GHEAL, the wife of Connor, king of Inishuna, and mother of the beauteous Suilmhall.

COLC-ULLANII, was the brother of Borbarduthul.

COLGACH. One of the ancestors of the tribe of Morni.

COLGAR, the oldest of the sons of Trathal, the grandfather of Fingal. Another Colgar was the son of Cathul, and principal bard to Cormac, king of Ireland. The only part of his poems which has come down to posterity, is a tender dialogue on the loves of Fingal, and his first wife Roscrana.

COMAL, a Fingalian Chief. He was the unwitting cause of the death of his mistress Gealmhlin. Brooding over his calamity, he became weary of life, and in battle he threw himself, unarmed, into the midst of the enemy, and was slain.

COMHAL, or CUMHAL, the father of the illustrious Fingal. The accounts of his achievements which have come down to us are but scanty: his life was unfortunate, and his death untimely. He fell in early youth, in an engagement with the tribe of Morni.

CONAN, was the Thersites of the Fingalians. Ossian and Ullin never make mention of him but with contempt.

CONAR. One of the kings of Ireland: he was the father of that Cormac who was dethroned by Cairbre. Conar was the son of Treunmor, the great grandfather of Fingal. It was owing to this connexion that the great Caledonian hero was involved in so many Irish wars.

CON-BAN-CARGLAS, the daughter of Torcuil-torno, king of Crathlun, in Sweden. Her father was defeated by Stairn, and slain: she was carried off by the conqueror, and was driven to distraction by his brutal treatment of her.

CONGAL, a petty king of Ulster.

CONNOR, king of Inishuna, was killed in an invasion of his kingdom. His son Cathmor succeeded him.

CONNAL, the son of Duth-carron. Another of the same name was a renowned Fingalian, who was slain in battle against Dargo, the Druid. Some say that he fell by the hands of his mistress Cridhmòr.

CORMAC, the son of Arth, king of Ireland. He was dethroned and murdered by Cairbre, who usurped the government.

CORMAR, one of the warriors who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle with the sons of Morni.

CRACA. One of the Shetland isles.

CRIDH-MIN, the second spouse of Dargo. Her premature and sudden death was occasioned by a rash experiment which her husband and his comrades made use of to put her conjugal affection to the test. The catastrophe is related by Ullin, in his pathetic poem, entitled, Dàn an Deirg.

CRIDHMÒR, the mistress of Connal, the son of Diaran.

CROMGILAS, one of the warriors who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle with the sons of Morni.

CROMLA, a mountain in Ulster.

CROMTHORMOD, one of the Orkney, or of the Shetland isles.

CRONAN. A stream which emptied itself into the Carron, near Stirling.

CROTHAR, was the ancestor of Cathmor, and the first of his family who settled in Atha.

CRUMTHORMOD, one of the Orkney, or of the Shetland isles.

CRUTH-GHEAL, the son of Grugal, was one of Cuchullin's chiefs. He was slain by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

CUCHULLIN. This hero was the son of Seuma, and grandson of Cathbaid, a wise and warlike Druid. In early youth he married Braigh-gheal, the daughter of Sorganlan. His wisdom and bravery procured him the guardianship of Cormac, the young king of Ireland, as well as the management of the war against Swaran, king of Scandinavia. His amazing strength is still proverbial among the Gael. Some say that one of his palaces was in the isle of Skye; the remains of which are still shewn. Campbell asserts that he was slain on the banks of the Legon, in battle with Torlath, a chief of Connaught.

D.

DAORGHILAS. One of Cuchullin's followers: also a name given to Dermid, the primogenitor of the Campbells.

DARDULENA, the daughter of Foldath.

DEARG, the son of Collath. He was slain by Ubar. Dearg is also the name of a warlike Druid, who vainly attempted to restore the fallen dignity of his order.

DEO-GHRÉINE, the daughter of Cairbre, and the wife of that Cruthgheal who was slain in battle by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

DEO-GRÉINE. One of the names of Fingal's standard.

DEUD-GHEAL, the adulterous wife of Cairbre. On separating from her first husband she received the one half of his goods, of which, at Cairbre's request, a fair division had been made by Cuchullin. She became afterwards the wife of Feaird, the son of Amun: but being incensed against Cuchullin, on account of an imagined unfairness in the division of Cairbre's property, she instigated her husband to a single combat with him, in which he (Feaird) was slain.

DIARMAD, the son of Duibhne, a young Fingalian warrior, from whom the Campbells derive their pedigree. His encounter with a wild boar, and his death consequent thereon, are celebrated in a poem by Ossian, in Smith's collection.

DORA, a mountain near Temora.

DUBH-CHOMAR, one of Cuchullin's chiefs. He was Cathbaid's rival for the affections of Morna, and slew him in single combat. He brought intelligence of his fate to the lady; and renewed his addresses, in the hope that his bravery might win her heart. She begged to get his sword still covered with Cathbaid's blood, and plunged into Dubh-chomar's breast. In the agonies of death, he prayed her to extract the weapon. She no sooner did so, than, with a dying effort, he buried it in her bosom.—Fing. b. i.

DUBH-MHIC-ROINNE, the son of Stairmor. He was a brave warrior; but the poems which give a detail of his exploits are extinct. He was one of the heroes who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle against the sons of Morni. He lived in the north-east of Caithness.

DUBH-SRON-GHEAL, one of Cuchullin's horses.

DUBHMOR, DUMOR, the father of that Minshuil who was forcibly taken off by Lamha, one of the leaders of Dumor's army. Minshuil's affections were placed on Ronan, who, on hearing of the forcement, went in pursuit of Lamha, whom he worsted and slew.

E.

EIRIN (Iar-inn, the Western Isle), Ireland.

EMHIR-ALUINN. See AOIBHIR-ALUINN.

EMHIR-CHAOIMH. See AOIBHIR-CHAOIMH.

ERAGON, the son of Annir.

ETHA. A tract of country in the west of Scotland.

F.

FÁIL, a name for Ireland.—Fing. book i.

FEAIRD, the son of Amun, an Irish chief. He fell in single combat with Cuchullin, against whom he had been instigated by his wife, the infamous Deudgheal.

FEARGUS was the second son of Fingal. From him descended Fergus, the son of Ere or Areath, who is styled, in Scottish annals, Fergus the Second. This Fergus came to the throne about 100 after the death of Ossian, that is, about the beginning of the fourth century. His genealogy is thus recorded by the Gaelic Seanachais:—"Feargus mae Areath, mhic Chongail, mhic Fhearguis, mhic Fhionnghail nam buadh;" Fergus the son of Areath, the son of Congal, the son of Fergus, the son of Fingal the Victorious.

FERRAIT-ARTHO, the son of Cairbre Mac Cormac, king of Ireland, by Baltanno, daughter of Conachar of Ullin.

FINGAL, king of the Caledonians, the hero of one of the most splendid epic poems in any language. He was the son of Cumhal and Morna the daughter of Thaddu. He was the father of Ossian. His grandfather was Trathuil, the son of Treunmòr.

FIDEALLAN, the first king of Innistore.

FILLEAN, the son of Fingal and Clatho. He lost his life in the cause of the family of Conar, king of Ireland. Ossian often calls him the son of Clatho, to distinguish him from the sons which Fingal had by Roscrana.

FIREOLG, supposed to have been a colony of British Belgæ, who, according to Irish antiquarians, settled in the south of Ireland.

FLATHAL, the wife of Learthonn, chief of the Firbolg.

FOLDATH, a conspicuous personage in Ossian's Temora. He was of the race of the Firbolg. He was fierce and fearless; but also generous. He was the friend of the usurper Cairbre, and assisted him in dethroning Cormac, king of Ireland.

G.

GABHRA, a narrow vale in Ulster, where Cairbre, king of Ireland, and Oscar, the son of Ossian, fought and fell by mutual wounds.

GEALMHIN, the daughter of Conlaech, and the mistress of Comal. She was accidentally slain by an arrow shot by her lover.

GOLL, Gaul, the son of Morni. He headed his clan for some time, and disputed the superiority with Fingal himself. He was at length worsted and brought to submission. After this he became the most faithful friend and ally of Fingal. He was ardently fond of a warrior's reputation; and sometimes, in the absence of the Caledonian chief, he was intrusted with the command of the Fingalian forces; but his valour was too impetuous for conducting an army. He owed his death to the following circumstance:—A party of Fingalians, having gone to plunder the hostile isle of Ibreine, were followed, some short time after, by Gaul, without any attendants. He landed on the island after his friends had pillaged and quitted it. He was surrounded by the exasperated inhabitants, against whom, with his back to a tree, he maintained a desperate conflict; until, amazed at his valour and afraid of his strength, they rolled down upon him a mass of rock which broke his thigh. The hero thus became incapable of further resistance, and fell a sacrifice to his enemies.

GORLO, king of the Orkneys.

GRUMHAL, the lord of Ardrven.

I.

IDALLA, Iidalla, the chief of Clonrath, on the shores of Lego in Ireland. In Temora, Ossian speaks in praise of his personal beauty and poetical genius.

INNIS-FÁIL, one of the ancient names of Ireland.

INNIS-THOIRNE, an island in Scandinavia.

INNISTORC, the Orkneys.

ITHONS, (the Isle of Waves), one of the Hebrides, perhaps Iona.

L.

LAMHA, one of the leaders of Dumor's forces. He was an admirer of Dumor's daughter Minshuil, to whom, with her father's consent, he paid his addresses, which were slighted. He carried her off by force; but, being pursued, he slew her. He was slain by Ronan, his rival.

LAMHATH, a small stream running behind the mountain Crommal, (Crom-mheall,) in the West Highlands. The rocky banks of this river afforded a hiding-place to Cairbre, the only remnant of the race of Conar, during the usurpation of Cairbre the son of Borbar-duthul.

LANO, a lake in Scandinavia, the mist of which was said to be pestilential.

LATHMON, supposed to have been a Pictish prince.

LEARTHONN, was chief of the Firbolg, and ancestor of Cairbre and Cathmor.

LEGO, a lake in Ulster.

LOCHLANN, LOCHLINN, Scandinavia.

LODAINN, LODA, a place in Scandinavia. Ossian makes frequent mention of the spirit of Loda; meaning thereby Odin, the divinity of the northern nations.

LORA, a precipitous stream in Argyllshire, near Selma; also the hill where the stream has its source, and which is remarkable for being the place where Cathmor posted himself previously to his engagement with Fingal.

LORMA, king of Innishuna. He succeeded his father Connor, and was slain in an invasion of his kingdom.

LOTHA, a river in the north of Scotland; perhaps the Lochy.

LUATH, (Swift). The favourite dog of Cuchullin.

LUBAR, a stream rising in Crom-mheal, a hill in the West Highlands. Near it was fought the first battle in which Gaul, the brave son of Morni, commanded the forces of Fingal. Also a river in Ulster.

LULAN, a river in Sweden, now Lula.

LUMAR, a hill in Innishuna.

M.

MAC-AN-LUINN, (the son of Luno), the sword of Fingal; so called from Luno its maker, a Scandinavian armourer. A traditional account of it says, that every stroke of it was mortal, and that Fingal made use of it only in cases of very pressing danger.

MALMHIN, MALVINA, the daughter of Toscar. She was the mistress of Oscar, the son of Ossian.

MANOS, king of Scandinavia. He invaded the dominions of Fingal, and, in a personal encounter with that hero, was worsted, disarmed, and bound. He regained his liberty on condition that he would either renew the general engagement, or leave the land as a vanquished foe. He embraced the latter condition with gratitude, and embarked, after swearing that he would never re-invade the country of his conqueror. After setting sail, his men, stung with disappointment and defeat, prevailed on him to return and renew the combat. He yielded to their request, and landed on Fingal's territory. A bloody battle ensued, in which Manos and his bravest chiefs were slain.

MARONNAN, the brother of Toscar.

MINGHEAL, the mistress of Dearg, or Dargo, the son of Collath. Her lament over her husband, who was slain by a boar, is still extant, and is full of pathos and affection.

MOILENA, a plain lying between the hills Mora and Lena, through which flowed the stream Lubar.

MOMAD, a name given to Gaul, the son of Morni.

MORA, a hill in the West Highlands; also a hill in Ireland.

MÖRHEINN, MORVEN. All the north-west coast of Scotland was so called; yet some learned antiquarians confine the name to the Isle of Mull.

MORNA, the wife of Comhal or Cumhal, and the mother of Fingal. Another female, of the same name, was the mistress of Cathbaid, who was slain by Dubhchomar.—Fing. book i.

MORNA, a district in the south of Connaught, once famous for being the residence of an archdruid. Here was a cavern, supposed to have been haunted by the spirits of the Fírbolg chiefs.

MORNI, the father of Gaul. On his death-bed he directed his son to lay his sword (the sword of Strumon) by his side, with injunctions not to take it away but on occasions of imminent danger.

N.

NATHOS, the son of Usnoth and Slisama the sister of Cuchullin.

O.

OG-GHOLL, or OGUILL, the son of Gaul, one of Fingal's allies.

OSSIAN (a celebrated Caledonian warrior and poet of the third century, was the son of Fingal, the Caledonian king, and Roscrana. He attended his father in most of his wars in Ireland, and succeeded him in the command of the army. At an advanced age he lost his sight, and became of course unfit for the business of the field. He cheered his misfortune and his solitude by celebrating the exploits of other warriors,—the subject of which his poems principally treat. The companion of his loneliness was Malvina, the amiable widow of his son Oscar. It is probable that it is to this female, who committed these poems to memory, that we ought to attribute their dissemination amongst the bards of her time, and their transmission, for fourteen centuries, from one race to another, of appointed rehearsers. They were ultimately collected, arranged, and translated, about the middle of the eighteenth century, partly by James Macpherson, and partly by Dr. J. Smith of Campbellton. The works of Ossian, speedily after their publication, excited the astonishment of every cultivated mind in Europe; and the most enlightened critics placed the bard of Caledonia among the first poets of any age. Ossian has been translated into Italian by Cesarotti; into French by Mons. Le Tournier; and the greater part of them into French verse by Baour-Lormian. The Germans have three different translations of them. Fingal has been translated into Latin hexameters, with very great success, by a Bishop Macdonald, a native of Scotland. The best of Ossian's poems are, of those in Macpherson's collection, Fionnghal and Tighmor;—of those in Dr. Smith's, Dán an Deirg, Tionna Ghuill, Diarmad, Trathuil, and Losga Teamhra.

R.

RONAN, the lover of Minshùil, the daughter of Dumor. His mistress was forcibly taken away by his rival Lamha. He went in pursuit, and a bloody engagement ensued, in which Lamha was slain by Ronan; but Lamha, anticipating his fate, put Minshùil to death. The circumstances of this deforcement are recorded in the beautiful poem by Orran, entitled, Cath-lamha.

ROSCRANA, the wife of Fingal, and the mother of the immortal Ossian. She was the daughter of Cormac Mac Conar, king of Scotland.

RUNMA, the father of Lamhor.

RUNO, RYNO, the son of Fingal and Clathro.

S.

SEALLAMA, SELMA, the name of a Fingalian palace, of which the ruins are still seen in Argyllshire. There was another Selma in Ulster.

SITH-ALUINN, (stately pace,) one of Cuchullin's chiefs, who was slain in battle by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.—Fing. book i.

SITH-FADA, (long pace), one of Cuchullin's horses.

SOMXOR was the father of Borbar-duthul, chief of Atha, and grandfather of Cairbre the usurper.

STARN, king of Lochlin, was the son of the barbarous Ainnir. He was the avowed foe of Fingal. Revenge, cunning, and cruelty, were the prominent features of his character.

STARNMOR, the father of Dubhmaruno.

STRUMON, a place in the neighbourhood of Selma. It was the residence of Gaul, the son of Morni.

STRUTHIMOR, one of those warriors who accompanied Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle against the sons of Morni.

SÜILMHALL was the daughter of Conmor, king of Inisthuna. She fell in love with Cathmor, the brother of Cairbre, king of Ireland, who had sent him to the aid of her father, whose territories had been invaded. On his departure from Inisthuna, she accompanied him in the disguise of a young warrior; but on the death of her lover, which happened a short time after, she returned to her native country.

T.

TI-FOIRNAL, TIGH-FOIRMELL, the only one of Fingal's palaces that was built of wood. Here the bards met yearly to recite their compositions, previously to their being submitted to the judgment of Fingal and of other chiefs.

TIGHMÖR, TEMORA, was the residence of the supreme kings of Ireland; and the name of one of Ossian's poems.

TLATHMÍN, the mistress of Clonar the son of Conglass, chief of Imör.

TÖNN-THEINE, a star, so called by the Fingalian mariners.

TÖRCUIL-TÖRNO, king of Crathlun, a district of Sweden. He was slain by Starno, king of Scandinavia, in an engagement which took place in consequence of a misunderstanding at a boar-hunt, to which he had invited Starno.

TRATHAL, the son of Treunmor and grandfather of Fingal.

TREC-FHEAR, brother to the king of Inniseon, supposed to have been one of the Orkneys.

TREUNMOR, the great-grandfather of Fingal. Though the poems be extinct which recorded the achievements of Treunmor, he was, without question, one of the first warriors of his time. He collected and joined the warlike Caledonian clans, and opposed their united strength to the Roman invaders; thus forming a barrier, which defeated all the strength and discipline of the legions of Rome.

TÛRA, a castle in Ulster. It was one of Cuchullin's places of residence; hence he is called the Lord of Tura.

U.

ÛLEIRÍN (iul-Eirin), a star known by that name in Ossian's time, meaning the Guide to Eirin.

ÛSNÖTH, the chief of Etha, a district on the west coast of Scotland.

UTHÖRNO, a bay in Scandinavia.
